http://www.arngren.net/
https://www.art.yale.edu/

   I choose proximity for my webpage exaggeration and these websites break all the rules about proximity as well as other elements. A GIF image is used as background makes it hard to focus on the main contents of the webpage. The navigation menu does not stand out, so it does not look like a very important element while it is supposed to be very important which navigates the viewer through the page.

   The elements with the same functions should be grouped together and have the same styles so that the audiences can easily find what they are looking for, but the websites break all those rule to be a good page. Therefore, what I do with my website is creating different kind of navigation menus. I also arrange images differently all around the page but not follow an order.